Abstract: In earlier work, we discussed using data encapsulation to provide integrated access to large amounts of heterogeneous information through WWW browsers. Here, we describe a visual data modeling language which supports the generation of metadata entities to encapsulate raw data. A prototype version of an interpreter for our interactive Visual Repository Definition Language (VRDL) is now operational and may be used for building and maintaining information repositories. 1. Abstract: In this paper we present a dialogue system that is able to entertain a conversation with an user who poses questions about the existence of Supreme Court Assents with some particular characteristics. The system we propose, is able to handle ambiguities in the user questions, clarifications made by the user and the situations where the user starts parallel discourses by introducing incompatible characteristics in his questions.
